Ik heb geen verstand van poëzie, G.A. van Oorschot als uitgever van poëzie Vries, Gert Jan

IMPORTANT NOTE: You are advised to consult the publisher's version (publisher's PDF) if you wish to cite from it. Please check the document version below.

Document Version
Publisher's PDF, also known as Version of record

Publication date:
1996

Link to publication in University of Groningen/UMCG research database

Citation for published version (APA): Vries, G. J. (1996). Ik heb geen verstand van poëzie, G.A. van Oorschot als uitgever van poëzie Uitgeverij G.A. van Oorschot

Copyright
Other than for strictly personal use, it is not permitted to download or to forward/distribute the text or part of it without the consent of the author(s) and/or copyright holder(s), unless the work is under an open content license (like Creative Commons).

Take-down policy
If you believe that this document breaches copyright please contact us providing details, and we will remove access to the work immediately and investigate your claim.

Downloaded from the University of Groningen/UMCG research database (Pure): http://www.rug.nl/research/portal. For technical reasons the number of authors shown on this cover page is limited to 10 maximum.
The investigation of the behaviour and activities of publishers is part of the shift towards the analysis of social, institutional and infrastructural aspects of literature that has recently taken place in studies of Dutch literature. Scholarly investigation of publishers and publishing houses is still relatively new. Two important contributions were made by Van den Brink (1984) and De Glas (1989). Van den Brink focussed on managerial and legal aspects related to the entire sector of the ‘information media’ (i.e. anything from publishing volumes of poetry to floppy disks), while De Glas concentrated on the development of the publication list of two prewar Dutch publishing houses. It is quite remarkable that, although the publishing companies he describes were ideological foundations serving the working classes, De Glas dismisses the opinions of publishers on literature and society as useless and irrelevant; instead, he suggests that a large-scale analysis of the publishing list yields a far more solid framework for writing an adequate history of a publishing house, which, in conjunction with matters pertaining to business economics, can provide insight into the long-term strategies of its policy-makers (see ‘Inleiding’).

The present study investigates a far smaller area than an entire sector of information media or complete publishing houses. It deals with the poetry catalogue of G.A. van Oorschot’s publishing house, which contains less than a hundred titles. Nevertheless, other aspects of the publishing house are also discussed, as is the publisher himself. In contrast to the approach of De Glas, the mental and moral profile of the publisher himself has been studied in detail. Mr. Van Oorschot always appealed to certain literary traditions, good taste and social interests, which offers a very

* Met dank aan Theo Heijnsbergen voor de vertaling fruitful starting point for the description of his company (see chapter 1).

Managerial, logistic and financial aspects are also analysed. In spite of the simple organisation, the structure of the company of G.A. van Oorschot had a great influence on its policy towards literature. Financial considerations were of far greater consequence than the publisher would ever have admitted. Studying the structure of the organisation furthermore shows how a company with hardly any staff could not only exist but even assume a status of authority with regard to matters of literary history (see chapter 11).

The moral profile of the publisher was mainly reflected in the literary magazines he published through the years and which he considered as 'weapons for a just cause'. These magazines (De baambrekker, Libertinage and Tirade respectively) were highly important to Van Oorschot's list of publications. The editors of these magazines, if not unpaid employees, were at least important and influential advisers to the company. The impractical preference of Van Oorschot for a certain (and certainly unpopular) political opinion upset and on several occasions even broke the otherwise fruitful relationship between the magazines and the output of the publishing house (see chapter 11).

Roughly speaking, the company's output of poetry consists of three categories of volumes of poetry, varying in form, size, price, 'completeness' and canonicity. Best known are the precious 'Collected Works' (Verzamelde Werken) of highly reputable poets; apart from many important poets from the interbellum, Van Oorschot in this series also brought together major poets from the first two decades of the century and, in a later period, some poets of his 'own breed' as well. Secondly, contemporary poetry of generally young poets was published mainly in separate small volumes; during the first few years of the company's existence, Van Oorschot seemed to use this format mainly for the exposure of uneven work of friends and sympathizers. In the mid-sixties his magazine Tirade drew together several poets who (despite their unmistakable differences) were soon regarded as a separate literary movement, and the work of these so-called Tirade-poets sold extremely well. Finally, some category, were being pul-

In 1967, undiplomatic disrupted the relations between catalogue, and Van Oorschot's knowledge of current literature, new editors finally put to an end from this 'solo' period and careers of the poets concerned were successful. Van Oorschot's equally outdated powers to blame for this; being became insecure and, consequently, which complicated matri-19 point for the description of his company logistic and financial aspects are also analythe simple organisation, the structure of the A. van Oorschot had a great influence on its ds literature. Financial considerations were of sequence than the publisher would ever have analyzing the structure of the organisation fur-shows how a company with hardly any staff ly exist but even assume a status of authority t matters of literary history (see chapter ii). profile of the publisher was mainly reflected y magazines he published through the years he considered as 'weapons for a just cause'. azines (De baanbreker, Libertinage and Tirade res-ere highly important to Van Oorschot's list of . The editors of these magazines, if not unpaid ere at least important and influential advisers any. The impractical preference of Van Oor-tain (and certainly impopular) political opi-and on several occasions even broke the othship between the magazines and the the publishing house (see chapter iii). spaking, the company's output of poetry con-categories of volumes of poetry, varying in price, 'completeness' and canonicity. Best the precious 'Collected Works' (Verzamelde highly reputable poets; apart from many im-ters from the interbellum, Van Oorschot in this brought together major poets from the first es of the century and, in a later period, some 's own breed' as well. Secondly, contemporary ly young poets was published mainly in al volumes; during the first few years of the existence, Van Oorschot seemed to use this for-the exposure of uneven work of friends and ers. In the mid-sixties his magazine Tirade drew veral poets who (despite their unmistakable dif-ere soon regarded as a separate literary move-the work of these so-called Tirade-poets sold extremely well. Finally, semi-canonical poets, the third category, were being published in the Vignettenreeks, a series which Van Oorschot continued to run for two decades, starting in 1952 (see chapter iv).

In 1967, undiplomatic manoeuvres of the publisher dis-upted the relations between magazine and publishing catalogue, and Van Oorschot was thrown back on his own knowledge of current literary affairs until 1976, when new editors finally put themselves forward. Acquisitions from this 'solo' period are not impressive; the literary ca-cers of the poets concerned were generally brief and unsuccessful. Van Oorschot's old-fashioned taste and his equally outdated powers of literary judgment are partly to blame for this; being aware of these shortcomings he became insecure and, consequently, needlessly capricious, which complicated matters even further (see chapter v).