Editorial

Political Parties’ Programmes: Examples of Governance against Human Rights?

Aurelia Colombi Ciacchi
Editor-in-Chief EJCL; Professor of Law and Governance, University of Groningen
A.L.B.Colombi.Ciacchi@rug.nl

Even in the oldest and most stable Western European democracies such as in the UK and the Netherlands, some political parties seem to view international human rights as one of their fiercest enemies. Two contributions in a previous issue of EJCL1 already mentioned the 2015 Manifesto of the British Conservative Party, which plans to scrap the Human Rights Act and replace it with a British Bill of Rights. Through the scrapping of the Human Rights Act, the Conservative Party explicitly intends to “break the formal link between British courts and the European Court of Human Rights”, and make the UK Supreme Court “the ultimate arbiter of human rights matters” in the country.2

The planned scrapping of the Human Rights Act is now put on hold until the Brexit arrangements are confirmed. On 24 January 2017, in the House of Commons, Justice Minister Sir Oliver Heald said: “We are committed to reforming our domestic human rights framework and we will return to our proposals once we know the arrangements for our exit from the European Union." He added it would take some time before a meeting is held with the Scottish justice minister to discuss repealing the Human Rights Act north of the border, as the government was prioritising Brexit. "I think it important for us to sort out the EU side of matters and the exit from the EU before we return to that subject," he said.3

---

The Government’s plans to scrap the Human Rights Act have thus been shelved until after Brexit. Some commentators report that according to some sources, Theresa May is preparing to abandon the plans for a British Bill of Rights entirely, because Brexit will significantly strengthen the sovereignty of British courts.4

This allegation, however, does not seem to match with previous statements of Theresa May according to which the independence of British courts from the ECtHR cannot be achieved through Brexit: the UK would need to withdraw from the ECHR. Indeed, Theresa May has been absolutely clear she does want to leave the Convention. In a speech of 25 April 2016, she said: “The ECHR can bind the hands of Parliament, adds nothing to our prosperity, makes us less secure by preventing the deportation of dangerous foreign nationals – and does nothing to change the attitude of governments like Russia’s when it comes to human rights. So regardless of the EU referendum, my view is this. If we want to reform human rights law in this country, it isn’t the EU we should leave but the ECHR and the jurisdiction of its court.”5

5 Home Secretary’s speech on the UK, EU and our place in the world, from: Home Office and the Rt Hon Theresa May MP, 25 April 2016. Retrieved 21 April 2017, https://www.gov.uk/government/speeches/home-secretarys-speech-on-the-uk-eu-and-our-place-in-the-world. Teresa May’s position is sharply criticized by Charles Falconer, who points out that “(t)he prime minister is wrong on every point (…), the Human Rights Act explicitly preserves parliamentary sovereignty (…); membership of the convention adds to UK prosperity (…); preventing the deportation of foreign terrorists because of what they may face on their return has not reduced our security, failing to stop homegrown Isis supporters going abroad and then returning to the UK is the much bigger threat to our security; and (…) if the UK leaves the convention that would be a green light for Russia to ignore any Strasbourg ruling it chose.” See C. Falconer, ‘Human rights are under threat – just when we need them most’. The Guardian
At present, the Conservative Party does not have a sufficient majority to leave the ECHR. In December 2016, Theresa May announced she would “campaign to leave the European Convention on Human Rights in 2020 election”. Then however, in April 2017, in a surprise move, she called a general election on 8 June. Obviously, the Tories want to grasp the chance to obtain a much larger majority in Parliament, since the mid April 2017 polls predict for them a 200 seat lead over Labour.

The first priority of the Conservative Party is to make a success out of Brexit. The Government is aware that it would not be wise to do two big constitutional reforms – Brexit and the scrapping of the Human Rights Act – at the same time. After having finalized Brexit, however, Theresa May is expected to pursue her plans to scrap the Human Rights Act and leave the ECHR further. Should the polls prediction become reality, after 8 June there will be a sufficient majority in the UK Parliament not only to conclude the Brexit negotiations more smoothly, but also to leave the ECHR. This could be a disaster for both the UK and Europe as a whole.9

8 The Justice Secretary Liz Truss said: “Given that we are leaving the European Union and we will have the Great Repeal Bill going through Parliament, clearly that is going to signify a major constitutional change. (…) (T)he British Bill of Rights, whilst it remains a commitment, is not something we can do at the same time as we are putting through that Great Repeal Bill. (…)That is going to affect the constitution. It’s important we only do one constitutional reform at a time.” See J. Stone, ‘British Bill of Rights plans shelved again for several more years, Justice Secretary confirms’. The Independent (independent.co.uk), 23 February 2017. Retrieved on 24 April 2017, http://www.independent.co.uk/news/uk/politics/scrap-human-rights-act-british-bill-of-rights-brexit-liz-truss-theresa-may-a7595336.html.

9 See C. Falconer (n. 5): “it will be a green light for despots and a disaster for ordinary people”. Already in January 2014, the President of the European Court of Human Rights, Judge Dean Spielmann, said in an interview that it would be a “political disaster” if Britain left the European Convention on Human Rights. See BBC News, 14 January 2014. Retrieved on 24 April 2017, http://www.bbc.com/news/uk-politics-25729321. For an academic analysis of the disadvantages of both Brexit and a withdrawal of the UK from the ECHR see i.a. T. Lock, T.G. Daly, E. Bates, C. Bell, K. Dzehtsiaroy, D. Edward, M. Hunt, K. Dimitrios, F. De Londras,
The British Conservative Party is not the sole political party in Europe who aims at reducing the impact of the ECHR and the ECtHR case law on national law. In the Netherlands, considerable limitations of the impact of international human rights on national law are currently planned by the People’s Party for Freedom and Democracy (Volkspartij voor Vrijheid en Democratie, VVD), led by the acting Prime Minister Mark Rutte, who won the last three general elections in June 2010, September 2012, and March 2017. According to its 2017–2021 Election Programme, the VVD intends to scrap the direct effect of international treaties and decisions of international organisations on Dutch law, and reduce the interpretative leeway of courts for what concerns international law – and human rights law in particular.

The Dutch Bar (Nederlandse Orde van Advocaten) has sharply criticized these VVD plans. The Report of the Dutch Bar’s Commission on the Rule of Law in Election Programmes (hereafter: “the Report”) analysed the 2017 election programmes of 13 Dutch political parties. It used three colors – green, orange, and red – to differentiate the plans that could improve the rule of law (marked in green) from the plans that could weaken the rule of law (marked in orange), and the plans clearly in conflict with the rule of law (marked in red). The Report marked two plans of the VVD in red: on the one hand, the plans to change both the international and the national law so as to allow to make Dutch citizens, who join a terrorist organisation, stateless; and on the other hand, the abovementioned plans to scrap the direct effect of international treaties and 11 Ibid, 23: “De directe doorwerking van ieder verbindende bepaling van verdragen en van besluiten van volkenrechtelijke organisaties moet worden afgeschaft”.

---

12 Ibid, 23: “minder interpretatie door rechters nodig”.

14 For an explanation of the use of the three colors see ibid., 6.

decisions of international organisations, and reduce the interpretative leeway of courts. The Report denounces that the latter proposal entails “a strong infringement of the protection of fundamental rights in the Netherlands as it is currently guaranteed by international treaties and independent Dutch and European courts”.

An even sharper criticism is raised by Professor Wouter Veraart from the VU University Amsterdam. He can hardly believe that the largest government party in the Netherlands could formulate such plans. “If this breaks through, one will no longer be able to invoke human rights before Dutch courts. Without adequate protection of fundamental rights, we find that a country no longer respects the rule of law. They want to withdraw from international treaties because these stand in the way of their immigration policy. This comes very close to what happens in America with Trump (…)”.

I fully agree with Veraart. Such examples of political governance against international human rights can usually be found in election programmes of far-right populist parties. That such plans are now pursued by the most voted political parties in the UK and the Netherlands, is a very worrying sign.

---

16 Ibid., 23.
17 Nederlandse Orde van Advocaten, ‘De rechtsstaat: een quick scan’ (n 13) 30.